What Is Living History?

By Stuart Edge-Gerrol

Unlike science, mathematics and other disciplines, history is typically restricted to the pages of books and the stories of major political figures and events. Understanding the reality of life in the past is difficult and often fails to reach those with different learning styles. The pictures of people in the past are in black and white; however, their reality was just as colorful as ours is today. Thus, it is crucial that the past be viewed as a living thing. Living history is an exciting and highly effective way to get students and adults excited and engaged in learning about our past.

Living history is exactly what its name implies. The re-creation of the past for the purposes of education has been an increasingly popular hobby for history buffs around the world. Only recently have museums and historical sites begun to use re-creations of the past to illustrate historical eras to their visitors.

Living History is many academic disciplines at work at once. Before a living history event, students utilize skills and knowledge in reading, writing, mathematics and occasionally science. During the event, students use their knowledge to perform what is essentially a drama activity.

An ancient proverb states, "Tell me, I'll forget. Teach me, I'll remember. Involve me, I'll understand!" Living history involves students by asking them to use all of their acquired knowledge to re-create a person from the past. The re-creation of a past era serves as an assessment of learning as well as a rich learning experience in its own right.

The Coy children help their father make a wheel barrow to trade at the store for credit. Young Miss Coy also works making butter that the family sells to the Vail's store.

How do students in the Living History Project learn?

Children involved in the Living History Project will experience a different living history event each year. A six year cycle of themes exposes students to six different historical focuses or eras. Instruction and learning activities that occur before each year's event will prepare each child to play his/her role as best as he/she can. The focus and purpose of the instruction will differ from grade to grade. As children go through each year of the cycle, they will become increasingly aware of differences in each historical era. This constructivist approach, so commonly used in popular standards based programs, will allow children to build their historical knowledge by relating to prior experiences. The content knowledge that students gain will be compatible with most local district curriculums and with the Vermont Framework of Standards. Nearly all of the content and skills set forth in the Framework of Standards will be met by this curriculum.

Since September 2001 I have seen the progress brought on by those who have served with me on the Board of Trustees. Some like Jere Berger, Diane Rosenmiller, Jon Mathewson have served well and continue in their interest in the Middletown Springs Historical Society. It has been a challenge to serve as the President and, as with all community service opportunities, it has had its rewards. One of them was to honor Frances Krouse after her passing. Fran left her mark on the Society as well as those who she taught during her life. I was there for her memorial service as well as her burial in Middletown Springs. Those of us who are left to continue her work are privileged to do so. Any organization has members who have dozens of things vying for their free time. Fran Krouse's dedication of so much of her life to the town's history was a selfless act not unlike the recording of the earlier town history by the Hon. Barnes Frisbie. The families who continue to live here have a historical legacy that is built on these two books.

Another reward was to see some of the residents who were selfless in their giving. Vera Blakely donated a 18th Century clock that once belonged to Eugene Gray and came down in the family. Hazel

Grover remembered the clock as a child. Kay Avery donated a historical document initialed by none other than Napoleon Bonaparte. The proceeds from the sale went to support the maintenance of the Mineral Springs Park.

Progress abounds in the efforts taken to restore and rebuild the museum's storage room. Hiring people to do the replastering, painting, electrical work, carpentry, and moving the entire collection are just of few of the accomplishments now in progress. Much of the effort arre due to the many volunteers from within and without the organization. The community support to maintain the Society's building and Springs Park comes from may sources. A large measure of thanks is due to the members of the Middletown Springs Garden Club for the attractive flower boxes they place on the Historical Society building every year.

Currently, the portico roof is being redone with the generous gift of slate from a local slate dealer who wishes to remain anonymous. There are always so many more to thanks due during the two years of effort put out by the Trustees and those who volunteer so generously. It has been my privilege to serve with a fine group of dedicated people.

The Strawberry Festival— a Classic Event

Visitors to the 28th Annual Strawberry Festival enjoyed their delicious desserts with a warm breeze under a sunny sky. Perfect Vermont berries from Dutton's Farmstand accompanied delicious biscuits baked by Priscilla Lane, Stewart's vanilla ice cream and Thomas Dairy whipped cream.

Brendan Taeffe, accompanying himself on guitar and fiddle, entertained with original compositions and traditional Irish tunes. Thanks to Jim Gilmour of Southview Arts, where Brendan recorded his recent album, for providing the sound system.

In the Museum Room Jon Mathewson was on hand to introduce a new exhibit of recent research about the early settlers of Middletown and vicinity, which he prepared for Vermont History Expo 2003, held earlier in June. On display in the exhibit is a ceremonial braided sash worn by Eastus Barker of Tinmouth when he was Sheriff of Rutland County from 1813 to 1820. Research has shown that the sash was likely made in Quebec, Canada before 1800.

Thanks again to Bill Clark for finding the best strawberries in Vermont and to Priscilla Lane for creating the freshest, tastiest baking powder biscuits. And thanks to all the volunteers who helped transport and prepare the berries and who served the short cake and beverages.

Profits from this year's festival set a new record of $1,125.00.

Recent Donation

The communion vessels used in the Middletown Methodist Episcopal Church were recently donated to the Society by the estate of Francis Bean, who was principal of the Middletown Springs High School in the 1930s and died in April 2003. The church, which was located at the intersection of West and South Streets in the corner of the Old Cemetery, was demolished in the 1950s.

Vermont teachers, historians and interested community members engaged in using Living History techniques to help people understand the past in a powerful and meaningful way. Current and future projects of the Association include: The Living History Curriculum Project, developing an elementary school curriculum with a teacher's guide, student texts and materials that couple living history with multi-disciplinary and developmentally appropriate instruction; a support network of materials and personnel available to schools and communities wishing to participate in the Living History Project; professional development opportunities for teachers interested learning to use the Living History Curriculum; development of living history projects at the high school and college level; and establishment of a Living History Museum.
